

AI as your sales coach.

Copy-paste prompts for running your own calls through Claude. Every one uses the same four moves, and the phrase "quote the exact moment or mark it MISSING" does the heavy lifting: it forces the answer to come from the transcript instead of being made up.

Give it a role

"You're my deal-desk analyst."

Show, don't tell

Paste the real transcript, not a description.

Give it memory

One running file per deal, pasted back each time.

One clear ask

Evidence quoted, gaps named, next step drafted.

The five prompts to steal RUN THEM IN ORDER, AFTER EVERY CALL

Capture the deal gets a memory

Here's today's call with [prospect]. Write the entry I should append to this deal's running file: date, attendees, what changed since the last call, every decision made, and every commitment with an owner and a date. Keep it tight; this file is the deal's memory.

Coaching ledger did last call's focus stick?

Here's my coaching log and today's call. Add a dated entry: what went well, gaps, one focus for next call. First, check if last call's focus stuck, and quote the moment.

Deal scorecard MEDDIC, letter by letter

You're my deal-desk analyst. Update this deal's MEDDIC scorecard from today's transcript. For each letter, quote the exact moment that proves it, or mark it MISSING, and call out which letters moved since the last call.

Swap MEDDIC for SPICED, BANT, or Sandler. The structure holds.

Game plan the 60-second pre-call brief

Using the deal file and the transcripts: the next call is [the meeting] with [buyer]. Give me a 60-second brief for it: the one goal, the three questions to ask, the landmine to avoid, and the exact opening line.

Drill practice on Claude, not the customer

Play [buyer name], the [role] from these transcripts. I want to practice [the moment]. Push back the way they would, don't go easy on me, and after each of my responses break character for one line of coaching. Start the meeting.

The deal-desk extras.

For the moments between calls: pressure-testing your champion, your objection handling, and the number you just typed into the CRM.

Four more worth stealing WHEN THE DEAL FEELS TOO GOOD

Champion test

From this transcript, is [name] a champion or just a friendly coach? Check three things and cite the evidence for each: do they have access to power, do they have a personal win if this closes, and have they actually spent internal capital selling for us yet? End with one concrete ask that would test them.

Objection autopsy

List every objection or pushback raised on this call, even the soft ones. Classify each as price, timing, authority, trust, or status quo. For each, quote what I said in response and score it 1 to 5, then write what a top rep would have said instead.

Mutual action plan

Draft a mutual action plan from what was agreed on this call: every milestone, the owner on each side, and the date. Flag anything that has no owner or no date, because that's where the deal will stall. Format it so I can paste it straight into the follow-up email.

Forecast honesty check

I have this deal at 70% to close this quarter in my CRM. Using only what's in these transcripts, argue against that number. What has the buyer actually committed to, in their own words? What am I assuming that no one ever said?

"Write my follow-up to Priya. Call went well, she liked the demo, pricing came up."

The anti-pattern. No transcript, just vibes: confident, generic, and it invents the details.

make it quote the transcript and it can't make things up.

Run it tonight

Export one call

Pull a transcript from your recorder (Zoom, Gong, Otter, anything). One real call beats ten hypotheticals.

Start the deal file

Run prompt 1 on it. Save Claude's entry as a doc. That doc is now the deal's memory.

Close the loop

After your next call with that prospect, paste the file back with prompt 2. The moment it checks your last focus, you'll get it.
